

The Coopers have a family tradition where each person says something nice about the other people at dinner.

I like that Mandy says hi to me at school, even when she's with her friends. Tony's sister acts like she doesn't know him.

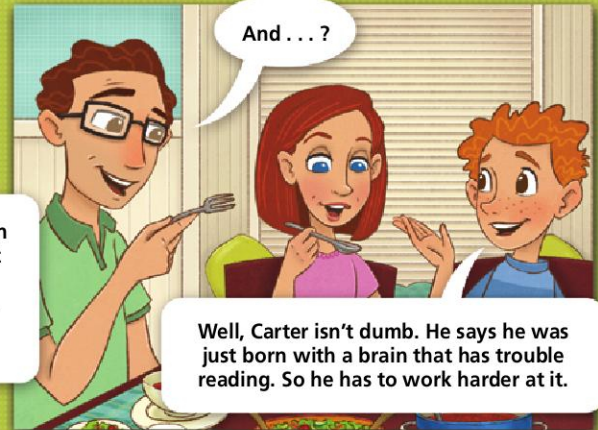

I like how Matt is a good friend to Franco.

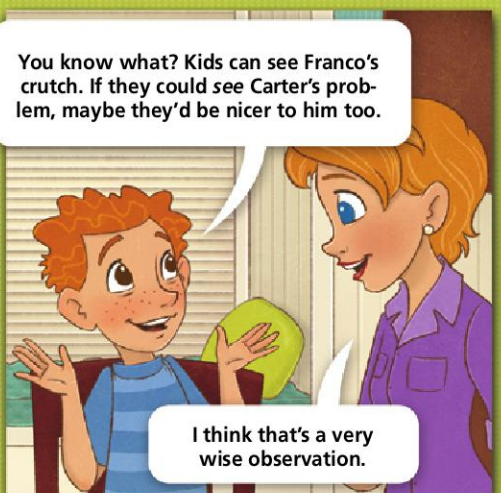

Franco's easy to like. Most of the kids are nice to him these days.

But there's this other kid in my class—Carter. He can't really read, and some of the kids think he's dumb. Ms. Wood made me his reading partner.

You know what? Kids can see Franco's crutch. If they could see Carter's problem, maybe they'd be nicer to him too.

This soup tastes really good, Dad.

Dad, does that count as another compliment?

